If you run into an image where Photoshop has trouble opening it, the most likely cause is that the file format is not a common one for Photoshop. If the file format is a TIFF or a JPEG, it should open without problem. If the format is a RAW file, it can't be opened in Photoshop until you convert it to a more common file format.

Images for web use It's important to know which images you can use on the Web. Unlike print, the Internet is vast, and just because you have a product idea doesn't mean that everyone who finds that product will even have a computer. As an example of the attention to detail that goes into websites, the Museum of Modern Art gives you a screen shot of an image that is for only its own website; any other use — be it print, packaging, CDs, or the likes — requires the specific permission of the artist. Of course, there's nothing stopping you from publishing images to the Web for personal, non-commercial use. That's very much allowed, by the way. Just be careful to give credit where credit is due — and make sure that you don't get yourself sued for copyright infringement in the process. You may use any type of image on the Web. In fact, there's a new type of image, called a Flash image, that has become a standard on many websites. A Flash image is an image embedded in the content of a Web page, not an image that you use in your own pages. Instead, Flash images are small movies, often engaging — but not always pretty — cartoons, or stories that can be seen on sites such as YouTube.

You can use a Flash image in all the same ways that you'd use an image embedded in your own website. Featuring the biggest of images No matter how big your image is, whether it's one frame or several hundred, you can easily fit it into almost any container. You can use just about anything to take an image and make it look good — be it a wooden box, a picture tube, a piece of water, or even a piece of Plexiglas. Just make sure that you're using the appropriate size. Unlike print, where you typically give an image a size in inches that corresponds to the size of the print, on the Web, the images you place are supposed to be the right size for whatever container you use.

As disclosed in Japanese Patent Application Publication No. 2003-311219 (Patent Document 1), a fuel battery described below is known. The fuel battery is described as a fuel cell for use in a hydrogen-powered fuel cell vehicle. In the fuel battery, a pair of electrodes is provided in a housing, and an internal surface of the housing forms an electrolyte plane. The housing comprises a metal case and a ceramic plate having an electroconductive ceramic layer, which becomes a gas-permeable electrode, formed on an inner surface thereof. The gas-permeable electrode of the housing and the electrodes of the metal case are electrically connected to each other via a joining layer. The gas-permeable electrode is placed in contact with a hydrogen-containing fuel gas (for example, hydrogen gas). On the other hand, one of the electrodes of the housing is placed in contact with an oxygen-containing air electrode. The housing, the electrodes, and the joining layer are welded together at a joining interface to form a final part. The joining is performed in a pre-bonding step before the final step, in which welding is performed in a final step. Then, the final step is performed in such a manner that heating and pressurization are alternately performed at the joining interface for a prescribed period of time. In the conventional technique, the electrodes of the housing are electrically connected via the joining layer. Therefore, the electrodes are integrally connected to each other. Accordingly, the electrodes of the housing cannot be separated from each other by demolding in the final step. Accordingly, the conventional technique has a problem in that a defective formed by a failure in the bonding is not taken into consideration.

Q: Hide and show div with function onclick I'm new to javascript and I'm trying to make a function which hides and shows divs depending on a button which is clicked. The code at the moment is working when the first button is clicked (It shows all of the divs, but then when you click on the second button
