Surgical endodontics: post-surgical care

JAMES L. GUTMANN

The post-surgical management of the patient is as important as the treatment planning for surgery and the surgical management of the patient. Patients who do not receive adequate and contemporary post-surgical instructions or who ignore these instructions are predisposed to untoward sequelae, including pain, swelling and possible infection, in addition to the potential for altered healing of both the oral soft tissues and supporting osseous structures. It is the endodontic surgeon's professional responsibility to ensure that verbal and written instructions are provided to patients that clearly define activities during the critical, early healing process. Furthermore, it is imperative that the endodontic surgeon have a complete understanding of and rationale for the instructions being given to the patient.

Introduction

While there are details given in most endodontic textbooks on the management of patients following surgical endodontics, little literature documentation is available that deals directly with this type of patient and the potential outcomes. Most of the data and directions available come for the oral surgery and periodontal literature and may or may not be specific to the surgical endodontic patient.

This paper will focus on the following key issues that are part of the comprehensive care that must be made available to all surgical endodontic patients.

- Post-surgical patient management.
- Management of post-surgical bleeding and swelling.
- Prevention and management of post-surgical pain.
- Post-surgical infection and antibiotic considerations.
- Post-surgical supportive therapy.
- Prevention and assessment of untoward sequelae.

In the majority of cases issues such as the use of analgesics to prevent pain, or antibiotics used prophylactically, are part of the initial treatment planning for the surgical procedure. Furthermore, detailed informed-consent forms provide the patient with an overall appraisal of the potential, post-surgical, untoward sequelae – Appendix 1.

Post-surgical patient management

The post-surgical management of the patient is important as the surgical management of the patient. Patients who do not receive adequate post-surgical instructions or who ignore these instructions are predisposed to untoward sequelae. It is the endodontic surgeon's responsibility to ensure that verbal and written instructions clearly define the patient's activities during the critical, early period of tissue healing. An example of written post-surgical instructions is provided in Appendix 2.

Management of post-surgical bleeding and swelling

Leakage or oozing from torn blood vessels will occur for several hours after surgery. However a little saliva mixed with blood may be perceived by the patient as a large amount of blood and a sign of hemorrhage. The forewarned patient will not make that mistake. Slight swelling of oral and facial tissues may also result from this leakage of blood into surrounding tissues and the ensuing inflammatory response. These are inconsequential, normal sequelae that require no additional treatment and should not alarm the endodontic surgeon or the patient.
